The Streets of Marbella

In our apartment

Where else could we begin but with an early memory from the Inaugural Tour, BDT 2002. Six of the seven Inaugural Tourists had landed late in the evening in Marbella and, after a trawl around the Old Town to find somewhere still serving Stella Miguels, we located a tiny little bar with a closed door. It looked uninviting but after a few tentative knocks we found ourselves being ushered in. Before you could say "seis cervezas por favor" we were in the midst of the first ever BDT session and part of an extended lock-in. Cue a 5am finish on what we had agreed before departure would be a "quiet night".

BT's flight was arriving the following morning and his fellow Inaugurals had promised we would wait for him in the apartment. We were true to our word, but we were also dead to the world when BT rocked up in Marbella at 11am, without the full address for the apartment and with his suitcase and golf clubs in tow.

BT spent the next couple of hours wandering the streets of Marbella in 30 degree heat repeatedly calling all his fellow Inaugurals' phones in a vain attempt to locate their whereabouts.

Suffice to say that when BT finally managed to wake one of the Inaugurals from their slumbers he was not an amused Dog; he arrived on the apartment doorstep with his arms nearly dropping off from the weight of his clobber and his shirt stuck fast to his torso. Not a happy camper and definitely the first ever Rottweiler shout! Thankfully a couple of beers later he had simmered down and, although we didn't know it at the time, tour life had begun for the Inaugurals.
