Smelly Sinatra's

60

BDT 2003 · La Manga

Written for the 2026 countdown to BDT 2026 in Scottsdale

During the Villa el Canine days of the trilogy of Marbella trips, Sinatra's Bar in Puerto Banus was a staple starting point for many a BDT night out, if for no other reasons than its convenient location and the ability to watch the posers going past in their souped-up motors.

Sinatra's Bar, Banus

Sinatra's was small and always jam-packed so, more often than not, we would congregate on the pavement outside and enjoy a couple of Stella Miguels; however, on this particular chilly evening in early May on BDT 2012 we were all packed inside the bar like sardines with all the bifold glass doors closed up.

Sipping and chatting away we noticed that people started pushing against us and jostling quite hard to get towards the bifold doors. Space was tight so we were a little baffled if not affronted by this sudden rudeness but before we knew it the staff were rushing to the bifold doors to concertina them open as quickly as possible, ushering everyone outside with some urgency. What on earth was going on, we wondered – there must be a fire somewhere, we thought, but there was no alarm nor any flames or smoke anywhere.

However, we began to notice that increasingly people were holding their noses or desperately covering them with their clothes, with disgusted looks on their faces. Then it hit us – the smell, that is.

The toilet at Sinatra's was unusually located to the front left part of the bar and it transpired that someone had gone in and utterly demolished the pan! The resultant smell was astonishingly shocking and, chuckling away to ourselves we joined the throngs on the street waiting for it to dissipate, Ravo was amongst us looking extremely sheepish, before he reluctantly confessed to doing the deed!!

Ravo on BDT 2012