Langers No Wangers

BDT 2002 & 2011 · Featuring Langers

Written for the 2026 countdown to BDT 2026 in Scottsdale

In the very first moment we recalled the time when a rather sweaty BT turned up at our Marbella apartment on the Inaugural Tour. However, when the six inaugurals had landed at the same apartment the previous evening, some other shenanigans had been taking place.

As we dumped our gear in our rooms Robbo, chuckling away to himself, had taken me to one side to show me a pile of Bill Grundies in his suitcase. Nothing unusual there, I thought, except that (a) they weren't his – he had stolen them from Langers's case and (b) he had literally only met Langers for the first time a couple of hours beforehand!

I must admit I did snigger along, particularly the following morning when a confused Langers was telling the other Inaugurals he was "absolutely sure he had packed some undies" as Robbo cracked the now immortal nickname for the first time – "looks like you are Langers no Wangers for this trip then!".

I had assumed that Robbo would come clean at some point that same day but actually he didn't break the news until the final day of the trip, a week later, after Langers had gone commando for several days! Thankfully this did not seem to affect Langers too much although it could have become a serious issue had he been allowed to participate in the pole dancing competition he tried desperately to join during the week! Which in turn led to another nickname of "Pole Dog No Pants".

Langers No Wangers!

Clearly this episode seriously scarred Langers, to the extent that we did not see or hear from him for the next eight tours until he resurfaced in Miami for BDT 2011 (a trip that, coincidentally I'm sure, Robbo was not on!). After this trip, he found himself with yet another nickname, Wonga no Longa, and I will leave you in the company of the great man himself as he explains his rather expensive evening!

LANGERS

"I think it was our second night in Miami and I found myself in another far too cool for school club with only a couple of other dogs, Neil and Oli – we were in the R&B downstairs Club while the other boys let rip upstairs before deciding it was too busy and leaving.

It was my round and I left the other two to go for some drinks. Literally my last memories were talking to a massive 30 stone black guy who invited me over to talk to his entourage – randomly several women all with the same stripy dresses on. I recall them all saying they were in the film industry and had come from some shoot.

After my first round with them it seemed a good idea to put my card behind the bar to repay the hospitality. I would like to thank that group for taking £740 of my money in 24 minutes – in hindsight it wasn't surprising that everyone was on great form and I didn't realise the tab was racking up with my lovely generosity.

The worst bit about this story is not knowing I had spent this much until I got home a few days later and spoke to HSBC to discuss spending irregularities on my card. I lost the other Dogs I was with by the time I'd taken myself down with the Hollywood crew (so that saved me a round!!), went for a wander round the streets of Miami finding a suitable rippers and a one man taxi back to Doral.

A very painful night on the wallet; however, I'd like to think they too recount that story of a p!ssed-up Brit buying everyone drinks to this day...If anyone recalls the name of said club, please advise so I can email them about getting a receipt breakdown..."
